Transition to College

In this section you will learn about the importance of knowing how to study properly in order to achieve your goal of succeeding at College. This section will cover the following areas: timetabling, planning for your work, sourcing for information, the process of making meaning or knowledge, note taking and note making, student health, study techniques, and listening to lectures.

Deciding to go to college is an important decision in your life. Getting admitted to college is a significant accomplishment. Succeeding in college is an even more significant accomplishment.

There are many differences between secondary school and college. Because of the differences, students often find the transition from secondary school to college to be very challenging. In fact, some students who enter college struggle to successfully complete their first year.

Here are some of the important differences between secondary school and college that can make a successful transition difficult. For each, you will find suggestions to help you successfully handle the difference.

The academic work in college is more difficult than it is in secondary school. This means that you will have to work both harder and longer. Secondary school students typically study 2 to 3 hours a week for each class. Since most college classes meet for 3 hours a week, you will have to study 3 times as much in college than you did in secondary school. Be prepared to take on this commitment.

In secondary school you are required to attend every class session. This is often not the case in college classes. Many college lecturers don't take attendance register. It will be easy for you to find things you would rather do than go to class. Don't give in to temptation. Students who attend and participate in classes on a regular basis get higher grades than students who don't. Make every effort to attend every class session.

You are going to have to be an independent learner in college. Secondary school teachers often check to see that you are doing your assignments and readings. College lecturers simply expect you to do these things. It is up to you to make sure that you do.

Your schedule of classes in college will be more spread out than your classes in secondary school. Secondary school classes typically meet daily. College classes meet 2 to 3 times a week. It is very important for you, therefore, to carefully manage the time in between classes. Creating and sticking to a study schedule is crucial.

Tests in secondary school classes are often given frequently and cover a small amount of information. Tests in college classes are given less frequently and cover a great deal of information. Sometimes the only test is the final examination. Make-up tests are rarely
